Chapter 1 by deep blue sea

The blood curdling scream once again pierced the envelope of silence around her. She stood numb staring into the endless darkness the road before her led into. She wanted to turn back and run, but her body surrendered to her fears and would not budge. And there she stood as her trembling legs gave away and she sank into a blur as her consciousness faded away.

Chapter 2 by Sanjay

"Get up." He whispered in her ear. "You had to leave her behind. She was dead weight. There is nothing wrong in that."

She opened her eyes slowly. Everything looked blurred, out of focus.

"You don't know that."

Words seeped through her tightly clenched jaws. "I should have stayed there for her. Just like you did for me." She was sobbing now.

"Shh.. It's all right." He held her in his hands.

"She wouldn't have done the same for you. Now get back on your feet and run.. run like hell."

She looked at his deep blue eyes as she struggled to her feet.

"I love you" she said as she saw him fade away.

She brushed off her tears as she ran forward. Her feet a little unsteady at first, picked up pace.

She took a right into the alley and ran straight to the Westside Avenue.

"Always hide in the upper floors of the buildings. They are always patrolling suspicious looking persons in those areas and they will not go there. It is the best place for hiding when it is actually the best. Hide there." He had told her one day.

Her heart was pounding as she slowed down to a walk. She tried to calm herself down. Her heart leapt to her mouth as she suddenly felt her mobile phone vibrating.

“Peekaboo, my love. Turn around.”

There was something in the voice that was familiar. She turned around. She froze. Staring at her from under a hood was a face, a face belonging to a man she had seen die five years ago.
